Thoroughly enjoyed the ESG diploma course. The materials were very current and the additional reading list is expansive. Strong module on Governance. Very useful signposting to key RSG standards organizations we all need to know about. Liked the online learning methodology so I could learn at my own pace. Highly recommend this course.

Better Governance Is Key to Avoiding New UK Fraud Sanctions

David W. Duffy

It's not all politics, either. David Duffy, CEO and co-founder of the Corporate Governance Institute, says that companies are also pulling back because they're afraid they'll be called out for a lack of substance to their claims of creating a more inclusive workplace.

"You can say you're increasing diversity initiatives just for the optics, but without data to back it up, you'll eventually get called out."

Stop Over-boarding

In a recent McKinsey survey, board directors reported spending more time on their work with fewer long-term results. Meanwhile, the Corporate Governance Institute notes that as boards expand their responsibilities, more time is required of members to be as effective.

One of the ways boards can ensure their members have ample time to commit to the success of their company is by cracking down on over-boarding. Over-boarding is the concept that the more boards a member sits on, the less their ability to serve these organizations effectively.

Insights Council member George Vlachos advocates for a point system that is popular in Europe and financial services companies. Each member gets four to five points with varying roles weighing differently:

- CEO at a different company: 3 points
- Chair position: 2 points
- General member: 1 point

Once a member reaches their limit, they must step back from one or more boards.
