The Jungle Book retelling

All of the wolf pack rose slowly (but they thought it was quick). All of them were hungry so Father Wolf - the one who cares about his pack - went to hunt. The wolves don't like Tabaqui - the argumentative jackal - because he causes trouble also people are afraid of him. He goes mad sometimes. They call it hydrophobia when an animal goes mad and then they run from other animals.

Tabaqui was saying that he was poor. He was also complimenting the cubs, saying that they had large beautiful eyes, but he reminds himself that the children are kings. Whilst he was chatting away, Father Wolf wasn't very agreeable, until Shere Khan, a very stubborn person, changed the place where he was hunting for food. Shere Khan lived in a beautiful (which lots of other would love to live near) place 20 miles away, near a river called Wainganga.

Father wolf, being the quarrelsome person he was, was certain that in the law of the jungle you can't change where you hunt (without letting anyone know). Father wolf wanted Shere Khan to absquatulate immediately. Tabaqui, with a sly smile, asked them if they were happy.

"Get out!" father wolf screamed.

"Go you absentminded freak," bellowed father wolf belligerently, and a bit out of hand.

Shere Khan (who was in a bush) was now making noises to scare the children. As the people and animals of the jungle had heard about Shere Khan, they were all unhappy. Mother Wolf pointed out that there was something coming towards them. Then, when they saw, they couldn't stop themselves - it was a man cub. There was a brown baby who could barely walk.
