

The building of St Paul's

Back at the time that St Paul's Cathedral was being built in London, the architect, Sir Christopher Wren was visiting the site.

He happened to notice three builders working closely together, two of them were frowning but the third was smiling. Curious, Sir Christopher Wren approached the three builders.

He asked the first frowning builder, "What are you doing?"
"I'm doing what I'm told," the builder answered, crossly.

He asked the second frowning builder the same question.
"I'm earning money so that I can feed my family," he snapped.

Finally Sir Christopher asked the man who seemed happy, "What are you doing?"
"I am building the most beautiful building in London," he replied with a smile. "For hundreds of years to come people from all over the world will visit this magnificent building and admire its beauty. They will feel inspired, uplifted and find peace here. I am playing my part in making these wonderful experiences happen. "
